Wireless Routers

There are so many ways we rely on the wireless router inside our home for mobility, flexibility, convenience and ease of use. Perhaps the router was picked up at a local box store or ordered online. But what happens when we start to notice video buffering or websites that are slow to load? The first reaction is to blame the internet provider only to find out the problem was caused by your home network. A few tips to consider:

- Router placement is key - for optimal performance and rate, place your router in the center of the home away from walls and obstructions. It is also important to shorten the distance between your router and devices – the farther away from your router your device is the weaker the signal.
- Upgrade to the latest Wi-Fi technologies – with the advancement of multiple wireless devices in the home, bandwidth consuming habits can slow a network down. Consider upgrading for better throughput or the ability to prioritize most needed applications.
- Upgrade the firmware – on occasion outdated software can cause poor performance. Watch for information from your router manufacturer.

Watch for more information coming soon to learn how WCCTA can help take away the hassle of your wireless router.
